GEI Energy Round-Up

This week's Energy Round-Up focuses on America's need for a balanced and diverse set of resources to power our electricity grid. The new study by analytics firm IHS Markit, co-sponsored by the Global Energy Institute, puts a price tag on just how important our current balance of coal, natural gas, nuclear and renewable energy really is to job growth, economic development and our security.

GEI Releases Diversity Report

Today's diverse mix of electricity resources saves us $114 billion per year in electricity costs. To read the full report, click here:

From Our Blog:

Heath Knakmuhs writes there's a price to be paid for less reliable electricity. Without a diverse energy mix, higher electricity prices would ripple through the economy meaning Americans would have to pay more for the products we purchase, the food we consume and the services we hire.
